Ingrained in Tradition

Indian sweets are not just made for consumption, but they also are prepared for cultural purposes. A sweet is considered a token of love and respect and hence it is offered to Gods, guests who drop in and exchanged as gifts in weddings and festivals. For centuries, a handful of mithais like Laddus, Balushashi, Panjiri, Khaja and Shakarpara topped the list of sweets that were exchanged during celebrations, owing to their longer shelf life. But with time, they became obsolete, at least for those looking for more sophisticated options. Chocolate, although easier to make, could never compete with mithai, considering its lack of cultural validation.

are not just made for consumption, but they also are cultural treasures. A sweet is considered a token of love and hence it is offered to Gods, guests who bring in good wishes, on birthdays, marriages, parties, anniversaries and other occasions. In the past, sweets were made with natural ingredients and were not as sweet as the ones we eat today. Over time, they became more indulgent and today's sweets are made with refined sugar and cream. However, the traditional sweets are still popular and are being rediscovered by many people who are looking for more wholesome options. Chocoballs, although a modern creation, are a good example of a sweet that is both delicious and healthy.
